

I feel that the "No Call" list should stay as it is. If people left a business or company for services, why should they or their affiliates be able to call you at annoying times 18 months after a consumer end relations with the organization? It is not right. If a consumer left the company, then there is more than likely a reason for this. It should be up to the consumer to contact a business and not the business. We, as consumers and tax payers, have the right not to be contacted via the telephone unless we want to be contacted.
